It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

FOREWORD

Ask the average man the location of the principal textile manufacturing center of the United States, and he will mistakenly name one of two or three cities in the New England States. Yet the combined output of the factories of the three largest textile manufacturing cities of New England does not equal that of Philadelphia's mills.

This misconception is doubtless due in great measure to the fact that the textile cities of the eastern states are noted almost exclusively for this one line of manufacture, while Philadelphia's products are so varied, and its reputation so world-wide for other lines, that its remarkable importance as a city of textile mills is not generally realized.

Stetson's Hats, Disston's Saws, Cramp's Ships, and Baldwin's Locomotives are known the world over, while but few appreciate the enormous value of the output of the weaving and spinning mills of this city. It is to show Philadelphia's importance as a textile manufacturing city and to provide a correct and handy directory of the textile mills for the use of domestic and foreign buyers that the material in this pamphlet has been compiled.

Growth and Extent of the Textile Industries of Philadelphia

By

JOHN J. MACFARLANE

Librarian of the Philadelphia Commercial Museum

Release 1-2-30 A.V.M.

An Englishman after visiting all the great manufacturing centers of Great Britain, Germany and the United States, said:

"I have just called Philadelphia the greatest manufacturing city in the world and I believe it to be so. True it does not compare with such monstrous aggregations as London and New York, but they are not manufacturing cities in the same sense. They are primarily something else, and the manufactures are mainly accidental or secondary. They are there because the population and traffic is there. That is shown by their miscellaneous character and the small scale on which most of them are conducted. In the aggregate they employ a vast number of people and produce an immense quantity of goods, but individually they belong rather to the small than the gross industries. But Philadelphia is primarily a manufacturing place and the industries are carried on in very large establishments on a great scale."

While some may question the right of Philadelphia to be called the largest manufacturing city in the world, none will dispute the statement that it is the largest textile manufacturing city.

In 1904, according to the census, there were 7,087 manufacturing establishments in Philadelphia employing 228,899 persons, with an output valued at 591 million dollars. Of these factories 1,331, with 80,310 employees and an output valued at 170 million dollars, were engaged in the textile industries alone. This shows that over one-third of the wage-earners engaged in, and nearly 30 per cent of the value of the products of, Philadelphia's manufacturing industries are found in the textile industries alone.

There are no official statistics at present available from which to determine the value of the products of Philadelphia's industries during 1909. According to the report of the Factory Inspector of Pennsylvania, there were 102,459 persons employed in the textile industries of Philadelphia in 1909, as compared with the 80,310 employed in 1904, according to the United States Census. This is an increase of 27 per cent, and assuming that the increase in the value of the products would be at the same ratio, although probably it would be greater, the value of the products of the textile industries of Philadelphia in 1909 would be about 215 million dollars.

The values of the output of the more strictly speaking textile industries of Philadelphia are given in the following table:

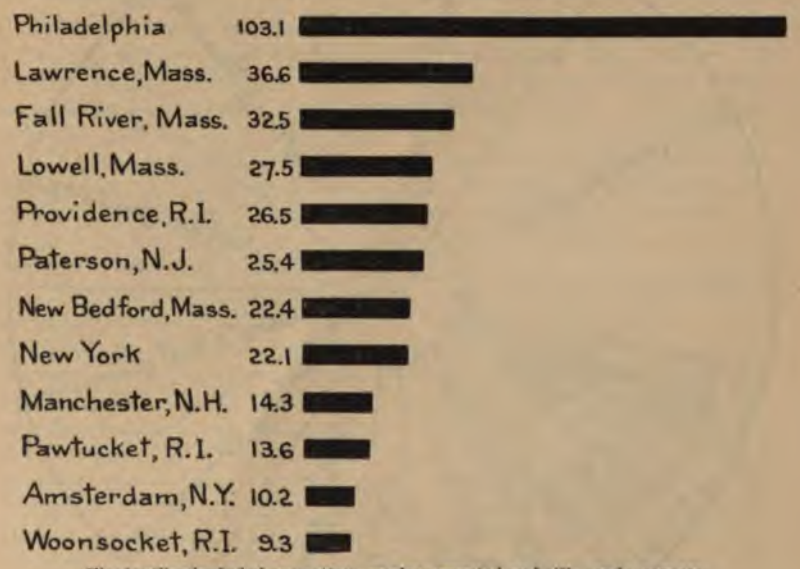
	Millions of dollars		Millions of dollars
Worsted goods	26.9	Dyeing and finishing textiles	4.3
Carpets and rugs	25.2	Cordage and twine	4.0
Cotton goods	17.4	Oil cloth	4.0
Hosiery and knit goods	15.7	Upholstering materials	2.2
Woolen goods	12.2	Millinery and lace goods	2.1
Silk goods	5 7

Considering only those in the first column, which are the leading textile industries, the total value of these in the textile cities of

LEADING TEXTILE CITIES OF THE UNITED STATES

Census of 1905

Values given in millions of dollars



The textiles included are cotton, woolen, worsted and silk goods, carpets, hosiery and knit goods

the United States, compared with that in Philadelphia, brings out the fact that Philadelphia exceeds the next three cities combined in the value of output, according to the Census of 1905:

	Millions of dollars		Millions of dollars
Philadelphia	103.1	Paterson, N. J.	25.4
Lawrence, Mass	36.6	New Bedford, Mass.	22.4
Fall River, Mass	32.5	New York City	22.1
Lowell, Mass	27.5	Manchester, N. H.	14.3
Providence, R. I	26.5	Pawtucket, R. I	13.6

One of the textile industries for which Philadelphia early became famous, and in which it now holds first rank, is that of the manufacture of hosiery and knit goods. Its importance to Philadelphia can be judged from the fact that there were 145 establishments employing 13,000 people manufacturing this class of goods in the city in 1905.

The first hosiery manufacturers in the United States were the Mennonites, who made these goods in Germantown—a part of Philadelphia—as early as 1700. They brought their crude frames from Germany and set them up in their homes. A century later

Values of articles given in millions of dollars

English knitters from Leicester and Nottingham settled in Germantown, bringing with them improved frames, and were able to secure the bulk of the trade.

The first knitting mill in America was started about 1825 by Thomas R. Fisher, at what was known as Fisher's Hollow, in Germantown. Up to this time each man operated his own frame in his own house. Fisher induced a number of them to bring their machines under one roof, thus forming a knitting mill, the selling being all done by one person. This mill was known as the Wakefield Mill. Later, Fisher offered to buy the frames, but feeling that as long as they had their own frames they were sure of work, few of the men were willing to sell. He then imported frames from England and had English knitters come to Germantown and operate them.

Thus was begun an industry the value of whose output in 1904 was 136 million dollars for the whole United States, or more than three times that of Great Britain in 1906. The leading hosiery manufacturing cities of the United States are as follows:

	Millions of dollars		Millions of dollars
Philadelphia	15.7	Cohoes, N. Y.	4.1
Utica, N. Y.	5.2	Lowell, Mass.	3.8
Amsterdam, N. Y.	4.6	Little Falls, N. Y.	2.5
Brooklyn, N. Y	4.1	Reading, Pa.	2.5

From this it will be seen that Philadelphia far exceeds any other city in the value of its output of hosiery and knit goods. Of the 230 establishments in this city in 1910, 125 are engaged in the manufacture of hosiery and 105 in the manufacture of underwear and knit goods.

According to British statistics the value of their output in this industry in 1906 was 43 million dollars, and they made 14 million dozen pairs of hose. Pennsylvania made 20 million dozen pairs, of which fully 10 million, or 70 per cent as much as in all of Great Britain, were made in Philadelphia alone.

Philadelphia is known the world over as a great carpet manufacturing center. While imported carpets were in use as early as 1758, it was not until 1775 that the first carpets made in America were manufactured at Philadelphia by William Calverly. He was followed by William P. Sprague, who made Turkish and Axminster carpets in Philadelphia as early as 1791. He produced a hand-made tufted carpet adorned with patriotic emblems for the floor of the United States Senate. This resulted in Alexander Hamilton having a tariff of from five to seven and a half per cent laid on all such imported stuffs so as to encourage their home manufacture. Dorsey followed with a carpet, half oilcloth and half carpet, seven feet wide; he was succeeded by Macauley in 1808, who developed the manufacture of Kidderminster or Scotch carpets, known in the United States as Ingrain carpets. This was the beginning of the enormous Ingrain carpet industry of Philadelphia.

The value of the total output of carpets in the United States in 1904 was 61 million dollars. The value of the Philadelphia output was 25 million dollars, or over 40 per cent of the whole country. There are 90 carpet mills in Philadelphia employing about 14,000 men. Of these 43 are engaged in the manufacture of Ingrain carpets, 30 in the manufacture of rugs, and 17 in the manufacture of Brussels, Axminster and other kinds of carpets. According to the census there wer 33 million yards of Ingrain carpet, 3.5 million yards of rugs, and 10 million yards of Tapestry Brussels and other kinds of carpets turned out in 1904. The value of the entire output of carpets in Great Britain in 1906 was only 20 million dollars, or 5 million less than that of Philadelphia. There were 26 million yards of carpet, and about 5 million yards of rugs made in Great Britain in 1906, which is a considerably smaller output than that of the Philadelphia mills, which turned out 43 million yards of carpet and 3.5 million yards of rugs in 1904.

It is not generally known that Philadelphia, though settled by Penn sixty years after the New England States, early held a prominent position in the manufacture of cotton goods. The first spinning-jenny seen in this country was exhibited at Philadelphia in 1775. The first joint stock company in the United States and probably the first company to make cotton goods was organized in Philadelphia in 1775, and known as "The United States Company of Philadelphia for Promoting American Manufactures." Slater, the pioneer of the cotton manufacturing industry in New England, was induced to come to this country through a notice in a newspaper that the Pennsylvania Legislature in 1788 had granted a premium of £10 to John Hague for introducing a machine for carding cotton. The first calico printing done in the United States was by John Hewson in 1789 at Philadelphia.

In the manufacture of cotton goods Philadelphia has an output valued at 17 million dollars. During the census year there were about 150 establishments; at present there are about 190 engaged in the manufacture of the different kinds of cotton goods.

In the New England cities the mills confine themselves mainly to the manufacture of cotton piece goods and yarns. Very little white piece goods, which form a large part of the New England product, are made in Philadelphia.

It was Philadelphia manufacturers who discovered the value of cotton as a decorative adjunct, and conceived and made into beautiful textures a vegetable fiber formerly unknown in decoration. It was from 1880 to 1890 that cotton chenille was found applicable to window curtains. Later the manufacture of tapestries and covers for pianos and tables and other minimum light fabrics was developed and became a great industry. The manufacture of cotton laces was introduced into Philadelphia at the Bromley Lace Works. Now, there are in Philadelphia quite a number of establishments manufacturing lace only, one of them said to be the largest lace mill in the world.

Of the 17 million dollars' worth of cotton goods manufactured in Philadelphia in the census year, 4 million dollars represented the value of the tapestry and 5 million, the value of the lace. Of the 9.5 million yards of tapestry made in the United States during the census year nearly 8 million were made in Philadelphia; and of the 53 million square yards of lace made in the United States 40 million were made in Philadelphia. These quantities will seem small in comparison when the present census values are known, as there has been an immense increase in the output of tapestry and lace in Philadelphia in the last five years.

There is more wool consumed in Philadelphia than in any other city in the United States; one-fifth of all the wool, both domestic and foreign, used in the United States is consumed in Philadelphia.

In the manufacture of woolen and worsted goods, including yarns, Philadelphia is the leading city in the United States, if not in the world. In woolen goods, according to the census, Philadelphia had an output valued at 12 million dollars. In worsted goods Philadelphia had an output of 27 million dollars. It can readily be seen by combining woolen and worsted goods, making 39 million dollars, that Philadelphia is the greatest woolen manufacturing center without taking into consideration the wool used in the carpet and hosiery and knit goods industries. This is the great center for the manufacture of yarns for the carpet and woolen industries; and in the manufacture of worsted yarn Philadelphia has overtaken Bradford, England.

According to the census there were 136 factories engaged in the manufacture of woolens and worsted goods in Philadelphia in 1904 and about 17,000 men employed in these industries, of which two-thirds were in the worsted industries. In 1910 there are nearly 200 factories in the combined industries, of which 75 are engaged in the manufacture of dress goods and men's wear, and 70 in the manufacture of yarn. The new census will show a great increase in the value of the output of the woolen and worsted industries of Philadelphia.

The first silk manufactured in the United States was at Philadelphia in 1815, when W. H. Horstman made silk trimmings. This firm still continues to manufacture silk trimmings and other forms of silk manufacture. They were the first to introduce the Jacquard loom into this country.

According to the census there were 31 firms, employing 2,681 persons, engaged in the manufacture of silk goods in Philadelphia, and the value of the output was 5 million dollars. In 1910 there are 77 firms engaged in the manufacture of the various kinds of silk goods in Philadelphia, most of them manufacturing upholstery materials, millinery and dress trimmings, ribbons and braids. A number of them are also engaged in the manufacture of broad silks and dress goods.

There are a number of other textile industries in which Philadelphia holds first rank, such as the manufacture of oilcloth and felt hats. The manufacture of cordage and the dyeing and finishing of textiles are also important industries, but owing to lack of space these cannot be taken up in this article.

The various textile industries not only of Philadelphia but of the whole country owe a great deal to the Philadelphia Textile School, which is organized as the first institution of its kind in the United States, having an equipment in the way of machinery and laboratories excelling that of any similar institution. Here every part of a textile manufactory is duplicated, and the pupils are instructed in all the details of the industry from the carding and spinning to the dyeing and finishing processes.

Philadelphia's Growth Since the Coming of the Railroads

By

GEORGE W. B. HICKS

Statistician to the Mayor of Philadelphia

In this day of large enterprises and the handling of big problems the average man is so pressed with duties which come with each hour that he is forced to concentrate all his attention upon conditions of the day and the work which that day brings. Even those who are regarded as well informed concerning current events are often far astray in their impression concerning the progress which their city has made, or the real position which it occupies among the great cities of the world. Having eyes fixed upon the present day, they have neither time nor opportunity to contrast conditions prevailing now with conditions common at some period in the past.

With this excuse for a backward glance and a contrast of conditions seventy-five years ago and now, no one can find a reason, even in the most pressing duty of the day, for failure to draw from the facts and figures which now follow the real lesson which they set forth—that Philadelphia stands at the forefront of all the cities of the world in that broad development which proves her title not only to the mother city of America but as a great city measured by world standards.

When the railroads first connected Philadelphia with the outer world, or in the year 1835, the city of Philadelphia then occupied its original boundaries—the Delaware, the Schuylkill, Vine to South—with the area of two square miles, or 1,280 acres. The consolidation of the old city with the outlying districts, which produced its present area of 129½ square miles or 82,930 acres, did not take place until nineteen years later, or in the year 1854. The population of the Philadelphia which welcomed the railroads in 1836 was, in round numbers, 100,000. To-day it numbers 1,550,000.

The city of that early time was divided into fifteen wards, in contrast with forty-seven today. The valuation of all property in 1835 within the limits of the old city was $68,528,742. The county, or that part which, by annexation in 1854, made the present city, had a value of $56,521,225, making the total valuation for the year 1835, $125,049,967, in contrast with the assessment put forth in the Controller's statement of July, 1910, of $1,457,108,533 for real estate, and with a valuation for the same period of personal property amounting to $525,506,195, a total value of real and personal property amounting to $1,982,614,729, or sixteen times the value possessed by the same area in 1835.

Nothing, perhaps, can drive home the lesson of Philadelphia's marvelous growth in such a striking manner as this contrast between a population of 100,000 in 1835 and a population of 1,550,000 in 1910, and a wealth of $125,049,967 in 1835 contrasted with an assessed value of real and personal property of $1,982,614,729 in 1910. This growth is further emphasized by the fact that the personal property value returned for one ward during the year 1910 was five per cent greater than the total of all property returned for both city and county in 1835.

Our building activity at the time when the railroads first made their appearance is another suggestive comparison, for in 1835 we built 465 houses, while last year our building record shows 12,013 houses erected in the same period of time, and our record for the month of July, 1910, shows that three times the number of buildings were started in that month as those represented by the building record for the whole year of 1835.

Further confirmation of Philadelphia's wonderful development in the period under review is furnished by contrasting the work of the city's Water Department, that great division of municipal work which so closely touches the health, comfort and prosperity of the community. In 1836 water was supplied to 18,704 tenants. In 1910 the number supplied was 302,000. In 1835 the daily consumption of each tenant was 220 gallons. In 1910 it had risen to more than 1,000 gallons. In that early period the city consumed 4,107,464 gallons of water every day. Today the city consumes 306,016,923 gallons every 24 hours. In 1835 this water was distributed to consumers through 93 miles of pipe, 40 miles of which was made of wood. Today 1,612 miles of steel and iron piping furnish the main avenues of distribution, while 1,340 miles of connecting pipe bring this water into the homes and business edifices.

Coming to another feature of city life—paving—the city in 1836 had only 37 miles of paved streets, and this of the roughest kind of rubble paving. Today the city possesses 1,365 miles of paved streets. Our sewerage system in 1835 was in its infancy, with a mileage of less than 36 miles, contrasting with a present-day mileage of 1,185.

As regards lighting—another factor of city affairs which makes for comfort in our day-by-day life—gas had not yet come to play its helpful part, for this was introduced in 1836, the gas works going into operation on the 8th day of February of that year, following a report by Samuel Merrick after his investigations in London during the year 1835. The registry of the times shows 19 private and 46 public burners, the capacity of the first gas works being 75,000 cubic feet a day, and the price $3.50 per 1,000 feet. Only two stores were then equipped for gas lighting. The present-day capacity of our gas works is 45,000,000 cubic feet per day, our gas street lamps number 22,792, and the number of customers supplied 314,000, the price today being $1 per 1,000, as compared with $3.50 in 1835.

A survey of educational matters as illustrated by conditions in 1835 will also aid in realizing the vast changes brought about by the marvelous growth of the city. The act of the Legislature bearing the date of the 30th of June, 1836, which directed the education of all children over four years of age and authorized the establishment of a Central High School, marked the beginning of our present school system. As it covered the county of Philadelphia, it represented in 1835 the school area of present-day Philadelphia. A few years later, or in 1841, the number of public school children enrolled in Philadelphia, city and county, numbered 27,808, which contrasts with an enrolment for the year 1909 of 174,136, and a population of school age of 250,000. At this early day the number of teachers employed in the public school service was 339. Today the teaching force of the public school system numbes 4,581. The salaries of the teachers in 1835 aggregated $110,250. The salaries paid teachers in 1909 show a total of $3,831,755.26.

Another feature of striking contrast between conditions then and now is afforded by that division of the city activity looked after officially by the newly created Department of Wharves, Docks and Ferries, and that sub-division represented by our foreign trade. In the year 1836 our imports totaled $15,068,233, our exports $3,971,555, or a total foreign trade of $19,039,786. Against this, place our foreign trade in 1909 with imports of $78,001,864; exports, $80,503,231, or a total of $158,505,095.

Coming a little closer to the subject we find that the commerce of the port for that earlier period showed 407 vessels entering the port with a tonnage of 89,485, and a clearance of 340 vessels with a tonnage of 64,019. This is in contrast with 1,199 vessels, tonnage 2,450,705, entered in 1909, and 1,094 cleared, 2,226,296 tonnage, in the same year.

It is also important that we should remember that street cars had not yet made their appearance in 1835 and that the omnibus furnished the only means of transit for the general public. This offers a striking contrast with our present day service of nearly 650 miles of underground, elevated and surface traction lines, and the facilities of inter-city travel offered by our three great railways. Only two bridges connected West Philadelphia with the main city, the Market Street and Spring Garden Street bridges. Railroad building was practically in its infancy, for there were only 23 miles of railroad in the whole country in 1830. The Philadelphia and Germantown Railway was opened in 1832; the Columbia line of combined canal and railroad opened into Philadelphia in 1834; in 1838 the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore, and the Camden and Amboy were opened, followed in 1842 by the Reading; ten years later the first charter was granted to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company.

Speaking broadly and from a governmental point of view, the period represented by the seventy-five years under review is one of considerable interest and value to the student of municipal affairs. The year 1835 marked a distinct change in our form of municipal government, by the appointment of a series of important standing committees of Councils, into whose charge was given the real government of the city. These great committees, by the ordinance of October 1, 1835, consisted of a Water Committee, Finance, Police, Highways, Cleansing the City, City Property, Legacies and Trusts, Commissioners of Girard College, Building of Girard College.

These committees were appointed for the purpose of auditing and controlling the expenditures of the city and giving necessary direction to the officers of the corporation for the prosecution of public work, each committee consisting of four members from each body of Council, or eight in all.

A little later, by ordinance, these committees were forbidden to exceed their appropriations or transfer any appropriation from one object to another. They presented annually to Councils estimates of the amount required for the public service for the ensuing year in their departments. Practically they assumed all real power of the Mayor of the city.

This movement was an effort to bring order out of the chaos which had preceded; but, in its turn, the new order developed even greater abuses through division of authority, culminating in our present charter, with its large powers granted to the Mayor, in 1887. This rearrangement of city government control tended to make the year 1835 notable in the history of the city, for it was during that year the curbing and paving of footways was taken up.

During that year, also, began the important improvements of Delaware avenue and Water street out of funds left by Stephen Girard, $50,000 being appropriated during the year 1835 for this work, followed by a large appropriation in the ensuing year, for the new Finance Committee of Councils had been given wide powers with the reorganization in 1835, and had the courage to use them. The first gas loan guaranteed by the city was issued in 1836, and so belongs to this period, marking the inauguration, from a financial point of view, of the city's close connection with the gas supply of the people.

At this time the city police was a force in name rather than in fact, its organization being elastic and responsibility divided. In connection with the inefficiency of the police at this time it should be recalled that the period from 1834 to 1844 was probably the most turbulent in the whole history of Philadelphia, some form of rioting marking nearly each year of the series, the whole culminating in the terrible riot of 1844, during which so many lives were lost and so much property was destroyed.

Indeed, the first real attempt at organizing a police force in Philadelphia along the lines known at the present time was made in the year 1835, for by the ordinance of January 1, 1835, the Mayor was given power to appoint one captain, eight silent watchmen and 35 watchmen for each of the four districts into which the city was divided. These officers, removable at pleasure, to have the power of constables, and that power vested by law in the old watch of the city. The Mayor was to appoint four special constables and to divide the city into beats and to procure the necessary watch houses. Half of the expense was to be paid by the Girard estate and half by the city. The captain of the watch was also to have the care and distribution of oil for the city lamps. This contrasts strongly with present-day conditions, when the city, in place of being divided into four districts, is divided into 41 districts, and the total force for this important work numbers 3,596, in contrast with the total force of 1835, which numbered 149.

Just prior to the opening of the period under review, or in 1832, Philadelphia was visited by a terrible epidemic of Asiatic cholera, which began on July 5, and was under control by October 4. During this short period there were 2,314 cases and 935 deaths, the ratio of cases to population being one to 70. Under our present well-organized Bureau of Health such an epidemic would be impossible today, and this reminder is merely of value as helping us to appreciate our benefits from this great public effort to preserve the health of the people.

The three-quarters of a century of which we are writing has, therefore, witnessed the organization of the police force, of a street cleaning department, of the fire department, and the development of our municipal government from a city ruled by nine autocratic committees, with divided authority, to a city where the Chief Executive has wide powers, and any failure to properly conduct government can be brought promptly home to the responsible official.

It may help us to realize just what the Philadelphia of 1835 really stood for, if we remember that since that date the whole of Fairmount Park, the largest in the world, has been called into existence; for the few acres bought for the Fairmount Water Works were merely purchased to secure a water supply and with no idea of a great public pleasure ground. Girard College was not in existence. Our great public library and public school systems have been born since then. Our great railway transportation system, represented in one branch by the greatest railway corporation in the world, has been wholly created during this period. Our fire department, recognized now as one of the greatest aids to comfort and safety in private life, and to the successful conduct of business life, has been wholly created since 1835. Our whole vast network of telephone and telegraph is of more recent date than the year mentioned.

Remembering all that has come to us during the past seventy-five years, contrasting the conditions of then and now, it seems to me impossible for any sane man to refuse agreement to the statement that we, as a people, particularly as citizens of Philadelphia, can face the future with a new confidence born of a clearer realization of our wonderful progress during the past seventy-five years.

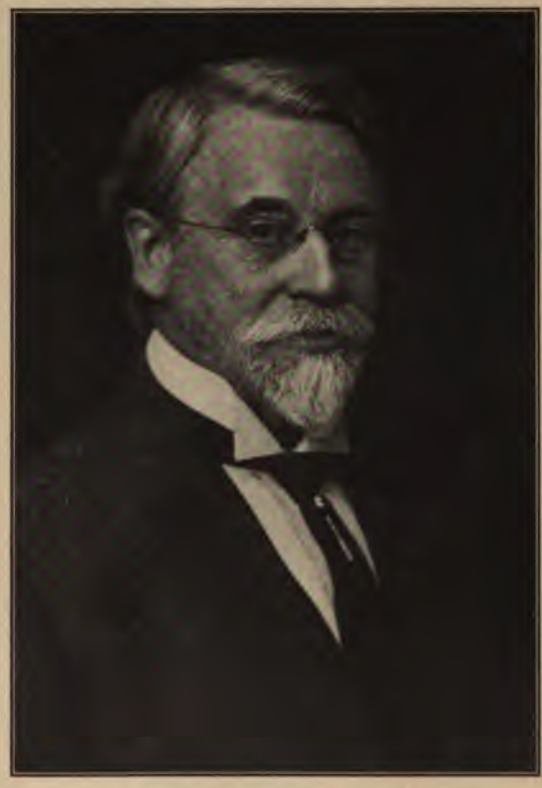
The Philadelphia Commercial Museum
Its Bureau of Foreign Trade

That Philadelphia should have had the foresight to establish and foster this Commercial Museum is not difficult of explanation. In a manufacturing city, the foremost in the world, there is constant and increasing need of such an institution. But, except for location, the



W. P. Wilson, Sc.D., Director of the Philadelphia Commercial Museum

Museum is much more than of local importance. Its ramifications extend into every quarter where human beings live and labor. The completeness of its facilities and the practical efficiency of its system are demonstrated continually. In some respects the Museum constitutes a school where American men of business can acquaint themselves with any subject relating to the commerce of the world.

In addition to the institution's very important educational and strictly museum work, it has developed to a high degree of efficiency a Foreign Trade Bureau whose activities have made a reputation for the Museum in every part of the globe.

The energies of this Bureau are devoted solely to the development of the international trade of the United States. It does this by encouraging individual manufacturers, who are properly equipped to handle the business, to extend the market for their wares to include foreign countries, and then by assisting them in a very practical manner in inaugurating and developing that trade. The service rendered by this Bureau is designed to meet the needs of the individual manufacturer, each manufacturer receiving that help which his particular case requires. The assistance and information given cover subjects of a wide range and varying nature. For example, the manufacturer is supplied with live and practical information touching trade possibilities and openings for his lines of goods; he is advised as to what foreign countries are supplying a particular market; is told of the drawbacks and discriminations against American goods and what steps must be taken to overcome these objections; is furnished with information concerning methods of packing goods for different countries, the best shipping routes and the prevailing freight rates, the consular and shipping papers necessary on specific shipments, and the customs duties charged by foreign countries on these shipments; is advised on the trade mark and patent laws of foreign countries and the restrictions and taxes which apply to commercial travelers and their samples in those countries; is supplied with the names of firms in foreign countries importing and dealing in particular lines of goods. In many foreign countries and in many lines of goods, business can best be conducted through a local agent, and an important feature of the work of the Bureau, therefore, is advising the best points at which to locate such agencies and suggesting the names of reputable firms in a position to handle the agency to the best interests of the American manufacturer.

Another very practical way in which the Foreign Trade Bureau helps the American manufacturer doing an export business is by translating his business correspondence, for which purpose it has an efficient and well-equipped Translation Department able to handle any commercial language. Letters received by American houses from firms abroad in a foreign language are sent by the recipients to this Translation Department, translated into English and returned. The manufacturer then writes his reply in English, sends it back for translation into the proper foreign language, and after such translation the reply is either returned to him or forwarded direct.

Not only does the Foreign Trade Bureau perform this direct service for American manufacturers but, conversely, it is constantly in receipt of a large number of inquiries from foreign firms asking for the names of makers of particular lines of goods and requesting to be placed in touch with such manufacturers. These inquiries are promptly referred to the manufacturers here who are best able to handle them. By reason of the great store of valuable information touching the subjects connected with the export trade, the Foreign Trade Bureau is always appealed to for assistance and inquiries are referred to it by foreign consuls located in the United States, by foreign trade organizations, frequently by heads of governmental departments abroad, occasionally by the several national departments in Washington, and by American consuls located abroad. It is promoting trade relations by serving both individual firms and governments.

Another feature of the Foreign Trade Bureau is its publication service. Two journals are regularly published—The Weekly Bulletin, which, as its name implies, is issued once a week (every Saturday), and Commercial America, a monthly publication issued in both English and Spanish. Commercial America is intended for circulation abroad for the purpose of interesting foreign buyers in American goods. The greater part of the magazine is devoted to a description of new and novel articles made in the United States and especially suited for export. Through the agency of information conveyed by Commercial America inquiries have resulted which have led to valuable trade connections for American manufacturers. The Weekly Bulletin circulates only in the United States among the manufacturers who are subscribers to the services of the Foreign Trade Bureau. It is, therefore, of a somewhat confidential nature, containing abstracts of letters received from foreign firms asking for information concerning specific American products, items concerning business conditions in foreign countries, trade hints received from foreign correspondents or culled from the foreign commercial press and from foreign consular reports, and a schedule of steamship sailings from all ports of the United States to foreign countries. These two publications—the one showing foreign importers and merchants what American manufacturers have to offer, and the other showing American manufacturers what foreign importers and merchants want and the articles for which they are in the market—are believed to cover the export field, in so far as it can be covered by publication work, in a most satisfactory manner. Besides these regular publications there are issued from time to time other pamphlets and reports bearing on commercial topics, such, for example, as "Foreign Trade Figures," showing trade conditions in every country which figures in international trade and pointing out the share the United States has in the business of each; "Cotton Manufactures," which has been the means of posting both producers and manufacturers on the world's trade in this commodity as well as specifying the standing of this country where cotton growing and further utilization is concerned.

As a result of several years of unremitting effort the Foreign Trade Bureau not only has intimate relations with American manufacturers and exporters, but is in close touch with reputable merchants, importers and large consumers and governmental and municipal authorities in foreign countries. Properly to carry on the
